LYCEUM THEATRE—"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" by Shakespeare. Duke of Venice, A. E. Anson; Prince of Morocco, Herbert Grimwood; Antonio, Ian MacLaren; Bassanio, Philip Merivale; Gratiano, W. I. Perival; Portia, David Warfield; Shylock, Morris Stranberg; Salerio, Horace Benham; Salarino, Reginald Gooding; Solanio, Albert Brundage; Tubal, David Warfield; Launcelot Gobbo, Percival Vivian; Old Gobbo, Fuller Mellich; Balthazar, Charles Harbury; Stephano, Edward H. Weyer; Leonardo, Edward Crandall; A Justice, Charles Harbury; Clerk of the Court, Nick Long; Duca Messinger, Henry Brown; Portia, Mary Serovos; Nerissa, Mary Ellis; Jessica, Mary Ellis; Magnifico of Venice, officers of the court of justice, gentlemen and servants, citizens of Venice, Jews, servants and others.

The New Shylock.

Nearly twenty years ago there began the story that some day in some theatre ruled over by Mr. Belasco David Warfield would appear in "The Merchant of Venice"; that before his role on the stage were all spent on lesser things he would attempt the role in Shakespeare for which his quality as a person and as an actor most nearly seemed to fit him and toward which all his roles from the days of "The Auctioneer" seemed to be leading him. Last night the story came true. At the Lyceum, in a rich, painstaking, generous and much embroiled revival of the much revived comedy, he came before New York as Shylock.

It is a good Shylock, one that wastes and scatters itself a little by too much vehemence, one that avoids carefully the shameless and preposterous bids for sympathy so many Shylocks have made, one that does not attain and may not have tried to attain heroic stature, but one that is authentic, believable, human and interesting. Here is no Luciferian figure, but just a badgered, miserable, resentful old man hating away for all he's worth. It is a singularly convincing performance of a role that has been played much and well in this city in recent years.

Of the Portia one cannot speak with equal affability. Indeed she seemed at first so unglamorous and uneventful a lady that the cynics among the first-nighters would have been forgiven had they yielded to the low suspicion that Mr. Belasco was not minded to have his Shylock dimmed by too sumptuous and shining a being at Belmont. Furthermore, Miss Serovos was given, apparently, to the kind of scrupulous enunciation that suggests the prize speaker at commencement or the young actress intimidated by Shakespeare. Then, too, she was innocently but hopelessly involved in much of the exit-laughingly or whinnying tradition of Shakespearean comedy, to which, as a protest against too much new fangled nonsense, the veteran director has clung, to our deep annoyance. But all along it was apparent that Miss Serovos was suffering from a cruel cold, and at the end of the fourth act, when Mr. Belasco was making his unflattering speech, he told of how good a soldier she was and of how she was playing Portia in the midst of an attack of quinsy and with a temperature running to 102. So we cannot know how good a cast this one at the Lyceum is until another night.

There is a certain stage in the education of a critic—it comes along about the sophomore year—when it is considered necessary to take the course in laughing at Mr. Belasco, and among other things, it is traditional to titter at the funny attention to detail he exhibits in staging a play at his theatre. It might be mentioned that among the details over which Mr. Belasco is fussy is the oft neglected detail of good acting, and that he sometimes carries his fussiness to the point of casting for the smallest roles actors that the fly-by-night producers would think plenty good enough for the stellar parts. Thus, "The Merchant" has been squanderously cast, and especially valuable in its performance are A. E. Anson as the Duke of Venice, Horace Benham as Lorenzo, Herbert Grimwood as the Prince of Morocco and Warde de Wolfe as an unexpected Jester at Belmont who sings charmingly in the moonlight and, on one occasion at least, seemed to be our old friend the clown strayed in from "Twelfth Night."

Among the embroideries aforesaid are the crowds that whirl through the carnival streets of Venice on the night of Jessica's flight; the synagogue that stands brooding in the background and from which issues the rich singing of the cantor at the Friday evening services; the sweet, invisible choir that spins a thread of melody for the lovely pearls of verse in the last act; the fine, lifting musical accompaniment which Norman O'Neill has written as a setting for the play; the crowds which mutter outside the courtroom and send up an angry, moaning tumult as the door opens for Shylock's last exit, and most curious of all, a scene introduced inside Shylock's house so that we are not left to imagine his anguished search for his daughter and his duets, but must needs see it, the while the shrill celebrations of the crowd outside sift through the half open door.

Some of these adornments help and some of them hinder, but what matters most is that the Shylock is a true and a real and an interesting Shylock and what we hope most is that the Portia, when herself again, may prove so sovereign.

MUSEUM GETS PAPYRUS TELLING TROUBLES OF OLD EGYPTIANS

Letters at Metropolitan Strike Modern Note, Referring to Landlord's Abuses and Domestic Difficulties.

Like a comedian at a funeral, there has just drifted into the Egyptian collection of the Metropolitan Museum a valuable as well as humorous touch in the guise of a few yellow sheets of papyrus recently unearthed in the excavations at Thebes and exhibited to-day for the first time with other treasure in the third Egyptian room. The impressiveness of the Egyptian collection, as a general thing, leaves the visitor with the idea that the ancient Egyptian was a stern being, whose life was devoid of any adventure save contemplating the undertaker. The interpretations which are beside these ancient writings reveal the fact that bawling and domestic difficulties were the real issue of the day.

These letters, written by Hekanakht, farmer, priest and gay old bird, were epistles which were largely directed to his family and his tenants while he was away on business. In answer to Meres, a tenant who wrote that he feared the dikes might burst and flood the land, this ancient landlord replied:

"Woe to all my people with thee. Guard the produce of my grain—guard everything of mine, for I shall hold thee responsible for it and if my land floods when Sheferu cultivates with thee—woe to thee and Siltahor."

In a later letter he gives instructions as follows: "You must give the victuals to my people only while they are doing work. Mind this! Make the most of all my land, strive to the uttermost; dig the ground with your noses in the work. See, if you are industrious, one will praise God for you. Lucky that I can support you."

Not content with all the accrued troubles of his estates, Hekanakht, who was evidently a widower, disrupted the peace of the household by taking unto himself a concubine. In a bitter letter written when the trouble seemed at its height he says: "He who shall interfere in any way with my concubine, he is against me and I am against him. Behold this, my concubine, and it is well known that a man's concubine ought to be treated well."

In the same room with these manuscripts are the objects yielded by the expeditions' excavations at Thebes and Thebes during the last two seasons. Included among these is an interesting collection of beads and scarabs.

Papyrus and camel's hair shawls and mid-nineteenth century bonnets, showing for the first time to-day in Gallery H 19, give to that room the spirit of whiff skirt days and the minut, Nine portraits of fair American womenhood, done in 1849 by Giuseppe Pagnani and presented to the museum in 1873, are part of the exhibition. They were a sort of art and social sensation when they were in the making, but are a trifle sallow as color goes to-day. For some time they have been in the museum's storage, to which place they will probably be returned at the end of the exhibition. The portraits are of Miss Minnie Parker of New York, as Euterpe; Miss Nellie Smyth of New York, as Thalia; Mrs. Willie Johnson of Providence, as Clio; Miss Sulzant of Cincinnati, as Erato; Miss Luce of New Orleans, as Melpomene; Miss Blodgett of New York, as Urania; Miss Wadsworth, Genesee, N. Y., as Calliope; Mrs. George Lorillard of New York, as Terpsichore, and Miss Ellen Shaw.
